good enough for him. But while the Chinese have clearly to the first type, the evolution of the sen has continued from the break o the reset from the read to the quill and now it is nearly half a century since the quil gave place almost entirely to the pen of metal. To-day pens are made by the ton, and according to W & Birgs in the Well-pring the industry is increase ing all the time.

Following the introduction of paper the quill came into use, the necessity for a finer instrument than the reed being at once apparent. The reed grew in the marshes of some of the countries of the East, was hollow and was out into short lengths and sharpened, but never yielded a fine point like the quill Not long after the discovery of the good qualities of the quill as a pen the raising of geese and some other fowls got a decided impetus in many, countries. England for a time imported 30,000,000 quills every year, valued at $125,000. Many different kinds were imported

There were the swan quill from Iceland, English goose quills. Irist goose quille, Hudson Bay goose quills, duck quills British crow quills and others. Poland, Holland, Germany and Russia were all big exporters of the product

In making the goose quill pen, which by the way, comes within the memory of very many now living, the quills were sorted as soon as picked and the outside taste was at fault. When his own poetic skin was removed by a hot sand bath comparison between his own genius or of the quills were then hardened by dipping them into a solution of alum or nitrie acid and hung up to dry. Next they must be hardened. At this point they are heated red hot and then dropped into oil, after which they are thoroughly cleaned and are ready for tempering. This is accomplished by reheating in cylinders which revolve over a steady fire. This operation gives them the elastic qualities necessary to meet any particular requirement. In all there are some fifteen processes through which each pen must go. After
